Potential for Success – How We Evaluate and Support Early and Growth Stage Companies.

By Tim Sheehan

At Commenda we are often approached by early stage and growth stage companies seeking capital. The general premise is, “if only I had more capital, I could really make this work.” We often find that capital alone is never enough. In fact, for many companies the grind of constantly raising capital is often a distraction from doing what matters most – focusing on your clients.

What’s My Company Worth?

By John Runningen

“What’s my company worth?” is THE question that we get from nearly every client that we see. It’s an important question. The value of your company will determine whether equity investors will invest, whether banks or other lenders will lend you growth capital you need, and whether the company will continue to grow or can eventually be sold for what you believe it is worth.

Don’t Go It Alone!

By Alan Abrams

Owners and CEOs of small and middle market companies should always consider engaging an investment banker when pursuing a major transaction, such as selling their company, making acquisitions or divestitures, or going public. Similarly, these companies should consider bringing in outside operational assistance when developing strategic plans, evaluating potential strategic alternatives, or raising capital.
